A Suggestion that Ought to End in

[For the Dispatch.] Last week, just before the adjournment of the Legislature, the city was much excited by the exhibition of Valentine's "monument to General Lee." I saw it after the crowd had ceased to visit the artist's studio, where it still remains. He is represented in a recumbent posture-the head and upper part of the body slightly elevated - giving the idea of perfect repose, but not of death, The likeness is admirable, not only of the features, but of the expression. The Generai was remarkable for manly beauty. As the cast was taken from his face when his health had declined, the cheeks were not so full as they had been a short time before, which is the only thing about the work that his friends can regret; and this proves the accuracy of the likeness. The attitude, drapery, and entire execution are excellent; the beautiful while marble, not inferior to the Canara, I am told is American; the sculptor is a Virginian; as a work of art, as far as I can judge, it has the bighest merit. The only two monumental effigies I remember to have seen-I mean reclining on a tombwhich appeared to me to be equal to it are time of "Mary Queen of Scots," in the chapel of Henry VII. in Westminster Abber, and of "Cardinal Richelieu," in the Church of the Sarbonne, in Paris.

Our State may be justly proud of him to of the menument, and of the sculptor. It is intended to be placed over the grave of the General in Lexington, which is exactly as it should be; but every citizen of not to remain in this city. The unexampled liberality and generous feelings which have prompted our friends in don't spell 'cat,' what do it spell?" England to give to Virginia a statue of the here "Stonewall Jackson," while it excites our gratitude, should induce us to do for Lee what Mr. Beresford Hope and his associates have done for Jackson. It would be most appropriate to have a statue of General Lee near that of his triend and companionin-arms, and both close by the great statue of Washington, to whom Lee was so nearly Hed. Shall not the State or the city undertake the work? The time is propitious, betere Lee's person is torgotten, and while Valcating, who took the cast from him alive, is yet among us. His statue, erect, representit a him in full vigor, with his martial appersone, would, I think, be far more interesting than a figure in the posture in which he is placed, however great its merits. This hint, I hope, will not be lost on those

It may be asked if these things are true, why it is that we keep Jones on our reportorial staff? We answer that it is on account of his legs. Brains and education are good qual fications for a newspaper reporter, but tegs are the main thing. No man who does not know can imagine the amount of walk- spell it Junious Henreigh Braughne. ing, travelling, and running about that a reperter has to do. A two-line item often represents a two-mile walk. The getting-up of a column of news often carries a man from a theatre to a church, from the church to a gin-shop, from the gin shop to the capital, from the capital to a negro hovel, from the hovel to On 'Change, from On 'Change to the slums, from the slums to the hotels, and from the hotels anywhere and everywhere that accident may call him or his fancy suggest. He may swap legs over who have influence, and admire the charactwenty miles a day, and then take a threeter of General Lee, and take an interest in mile tramp, after midnight, looking up the details of a suburban brawl.

Now, Jones is the only man that we know of who is absolutely ubiquitous. He has no wirgs; be uses no velocipede; be doesn's ride on the wirgs of the morning; he relies solely on his legs, a shapely but not a conspicuous pair, to carry him about. And yet he is everywhere.
